

We build stronger communities.

At Jones Whitsett Architects we share a passion to design new buildings that will inspire and endure for generations. We work in a studio focused on education, shelter and civic architecture because we want to make a difference—to have a positive influence on the place we live.

We are driven to find a balance between short-term and long-term impacts, including costs measured in energy, water and land use. We actively commit to the professional standards of the AIA, including the Frameworks for Design Excellence and the 2030 Challenge for Carbon-Neutrality.

We are shaped by our region and concern for the well-being of people, place and planet. We are a diverse team with a strong sense of place, from the winding curves of the Connecticut River to the silhouettes of the Berkshire Mountains. We are proud that our work is directly influenced by a region rich in ecology, agriculture and industrial history.

We engage with building science on every project, and incorporate fresh air, daylight, good acoustic design, natural materials and a healthy landscape in all of our work.

Our process is based in collaboration, investigation and integration.

We describe ourselves as “horizontally structured” because we are small enough to involve every member of our team in almost every project and recognize that good ideas can come from anyone. We are always working to become more inclusive and transparent, while listening carefully to our clients needs and priorities.

As a firm, we enjoy bouncing from the minute details of a thin, but well-insulated eave to the regional implications of where a project is sited. It is our ability to focus on both ends of the spectrum that enables us to bring innovative ideas and value to our clients.
